A Pagan's Journey Into Death

by Kate Bowditch, MA

This book is a journal of one mans good death. When her husband was diagnosed with inoperable cancer, the author and he decided to live this death to the fullest. She kept a record of all that occurred. Deeply committed to the earth and to each other, they allowed the trees to speak to them, cats to guard them, and huge energy vortexes to hold their house for them. Their faith allowed them to stay awake and aware of all that the earth could bring them for support and encouragement. The unfolding theme of Strength was offered as both comfort and command, by the mysterious and vast Bird Woman, an ancient figure from the Mid-East. This is a record of the events, emotions, miracles and wonders that took place as her husband walked into his death open eyed, with love and peace. The Mountain and the Shadow is a new look into the very eye of death. The author courageously details her own struggles, and the amazing works of others, as this beloved man leaves them. She gives details of difficulties with sleep, eating and hygiene that are common to all who care for the very ill. She also illustrates the way the natural world offers messages of hope and courage to all who will listen. Through the teachings of her dying husband, she helps the reader approach the truth that death is as natural as birth, and can be treated in a similar way with conversations, preparations, parties and blessings. She gives the reader a sort of new map, from a different perspective, of the territory of death. This is a must-read for all who are outside the mainstream faiths, for all end-of-life care-givers, and for anyone who seeks knowledge of how such people can face life changing crises.
