Two women, both beautiful, both literally and metaphorically high fliers, consumed by relentless ambition, and yet remaining oddly unfulfilled by their achievements. Separated by time and geography they are not destined to meet in the flesh, but a chance phone call sets off a chain of events which bridges the decades between them and brings their lives together in dramatic fashion. They are linked by one man, Jack Buckman, a Saskatchewan farm boy with a talent for writing and an adventurous spirit that takes him to England in 1940 to fight a war in bombers. Sixty sorties to his credit; Jack has one last mission, before being posted to fly a desk: the epic Dambusters Raid. The stirring and graphic story of his war and a turbulent love affair is told through his personal journals, hidden away on the other side of the Atlantic in the safekeeping of a wartime WAAF friend, until her death releases them, telling the story from her personal memories in a letter to Jack's descendants. Karla is the recipient of the Journals, the letter and a collection of photographs, which unlock the secret of her family history in a way she could never have imagined. A 35-year-old long haul airline captain, Karla adds her perspective to the story through visions received while in a drug-induced coma, following a flying accident. During her visions, she finds herself fulfilling her most cherished ambitions, whilst horrifically being at the centre of a multiple rape and murder. After recuperating from her accident, Karla continues to strive relentlessly to reach the pinnacle of success and happiness, but also descends into the depths of loss and despair during an almost seamless succession of bizarre experiences. She believes them to be a blending of the recently read vivid accounts from Jack's journals, photos and other research material constructed by her traumatized subconscious mind, but too many echoes from another woman's distant past bring her to the possibility of other conclusions. Pregnancy and a once in a lifetime professional offer conspire to complicate and disrupt her normally ordered life, threatening to destroy her long-term relationship with Aaron. Ultimately, a seahorse links Karla to the other woman, a force rescuing her from a possible life of regret; it presents her with unthinkable answers to her questions.
